Doctor of Business Administration (Global DBA)

The LondonBES DBA is designed to raise the level of professional capabilities of practising senior managers and executives. It does this by developing the practitioner's skills of reflective practice, by enhancing their knowledge of leading-edge areas of business, and by providing the opportunity to develop their capabilities in practice-based research by means of a major research project. During the first two phases of the course, this is achieved through a combination of taught and self-study elements. During the third phase of the programme of study, participants undertake a major research project that focuses on the work they are undertaking in their organisation as senior professionals, typically in change leadership roles.

Who is the LondonBES DBA for?

Our DBA is designed for busy senior managers and executives who want to gain new insights and perspectives into leadership and management based on critical exploration of their own evolving professional practice. It is particularly appropriate for those wishing to improve their capability to lead and manage change in an established or new organisation without having to seek time off for formal study. A key role is played in their capability enhancement by the capstone research project, which enables practitioners to improve their professional practice by undertaking rigorous research into that practice.

How is the LondonBES DBA studied?

You can start the DBA in September or February, and you study part-time over 2 to 5 years. Most of your study will be undertaken while you continue your role as a senior professional. However, there are occasional seminars, workshops and lectures which will involve you attending our London campus, usually in the evening or at the weekend. Throughout the programme of studies, you will have the support of your tutors, your personal academic adviser, one or more specialist consultants, and your peers on the programme.

What is distinctive about the LondonBES DBA?

It is the professional equivalent of the academic PhD (Doctor of Philosophy), but designed specifically to support participants in undertaking practice-based research into their workplace activities. While the knowledge gained from this research is equally rigorous to the PhD, it is distinctive in that the participant is placed at the centre of their research investigation, and their findings tend to be highly applicable within their organisation. It provides participants with the opportunity to enhance their professional capabilities at an advanced level through the study of elective modules. These capabilities will feed into, and be evaluated through the participants research project. Because senior professionals have achieved a significant amount of both formal and informal learning, sometimes over many years, the DBA provides an opportunity to make a claim for academic credits against relevant prior learning. It focuses on developing participants' individual capabilities as reflective practitioners, and through this enhancing their capability, for undertaking high-level, practice-based research within their own workplace. Participants study paths and projects are tailored to meet their individual needs and interests, and those of their organisations. Develop advanced management skills and receive an international qualification with this modern programme with variety of industry specialisations. Equipped with the latest in management and leadership theory, techniques and practices in all aspects of business operations, you will be in demand with top employers around the world. Our faculty benefits from global industry experience and will provide you with a solid foundation in holistic strategic business management. You will also gain the practical skills to apply your knowledge in the workplace, preparing you for rewarding senior management roles.

What Is A PhD?

Brief definition
In the UK, a PhD stands for ‘Doctor of Philosophy’, sometimes referred to as a ‘doctorate’. It is the highest level of degree that a student can achieve.

How to apply for a PhD
Prospective PhD students are usually expected to submit a research proposal to the department they wish to undertake their study in. Some departments will encourage students to discuss their ideas with an academic working in that field first. The proposal will outline what they intend their research to investigate, how it relates to other research in their field and what methods they intend to use to carry out their research.

How long is the course?
A PhD usually lasts three or four years, any available funding usually lasts for that time. Students may be able to take extra time in order to complete their thesis but this will usually be at their own expense. For part-time, self-funded students, a PhD can take up to seven years.

Career prospects for PhD Students
As a Doctoral student you will be actively contributing to the research community and PhD graduates who go on to work in academia usually start off by undertaking postdoctoral research and then a fellowship or lectureship. Other career options will depend on what the PhD was in – commercial research is an option for some, and many are able to use their specialist knowledge and research skills in areas of business and teaching.

What’s involved
A PhD usually culminates in a dissertation of around 80,000-100,000 words, based on research carried out over the course of their study. The research must be original and aim to create new knowledge or theories in their specialist area, or build on existing knowledge or theories.

There is little taught element in a PhD – students are expected to work independently, supported by their department and a supervisor. There may be seminars to attend complete, depending on the subject.

During their study, students will try and get academic papers published and present their work at conferences, which will allow them to get feedback on their ideas for their dissertation.

PhD Entry requirements
What you need to apply for this course Candidates should normally possess:
1- master degree in general management or a business related subject;
2- two personal references from academic referees confirming candidates' suitability for the programme.

Candidates should be able to provide evidence of relevant educational, professional and personal experience that meet their high intellectual and personal demands of the programme; and their potential to complete the programme within the designated time.

Holders of non-UK degrees will be subject to the University's normal entry procedures for equivalence of qualifications.
